28.76% of Revenue

This group represents customers who frequently purchase a high volume of your products. They may not always buy the most expensive items (average revenue per unit isn't the highest), but their overall spend is significantly higher than other groups.

For these customers, consider offering volume discounts or bundled deals on your products. They seem to buy frequently and in large quantities, so any incentives that encourage bulk buying will likely appeal to them. Also, keep them engaged with regular updates on new products or promotions.

1 Value Maximizers

38.7% of Revenue

These customers have a moderate overall spend but a higher revenue per unit, indicating a preference for higher-end, potentially premium products, . They shop less frequently than the Honeycomb Hoarders, but when they do, they tend to go for the luxury items.

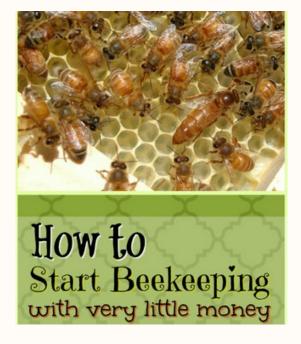

As the group contributing the highest share of revenues, Market your premium products towards this group. Given their preference for higherend items, consider offering them exclusive access to new premium product launches, or perhaps a loyalty program that rewards high average spending.

2 High-Yield Patrons

Given their tendency to spend big on premium items, personalized service might be a great approach for these customers. Consider offering a VIP membership or personalized recommendations. These customers are also likely to appreciate being the first to know about new premium product arrivals.

3 Frugal Shoppers

These customers spend the least overall and have the lowest revenue per unit. They don't shop often, but when they do, they tend to go for more affordable or lower-priced items, making them your budget-conscious customers.

Since these customers are more budget-conscious, focus on offering them great value for their money. Promotions, discounts, or sales would be attractive to this group. Also, consider marketing more affordable products to them.

4 Luxury Enthusiasts

These customers are interested in specific high-revenue products such as bee pollen. Keep them in the loop about new variants of their favorite products, or offer discounts on related products to encourage cross-selling.
